

Written information is not blown away

A informação escrita o vento não leva

This editorial is dedicated to Ricardo Baroudi, Patron of the Brazilian Journal of Plastic Surgery.

Dr. Ricardo is an example of living life in an organized and conscientious way: setting goals and plans, executing them with delight, and achieving them. Being the master of his own destiny, having free will, commanding at the helm, and controlling the rudder in the best possible way for himself and others.

A master of many. Indeed, many more than he knows in person. In his long and distinguished career, he merged and switched between academic life and social life, research and teaching, and in political and organizational participation. There are few who attain respect in all spheres of their specialty, establish strategies, define techniques, and become eponyms. Even neologisms have been created in his recognition. As one among many possible examples, the adhesion sutures today known worldwide as “Baroudi sutures” are part of a surgeon’s daily routine and a reason for clinical and experimental trials; many of them are published in our Journal and in international journals.

Over the last seven years, Dr. Baroudi worked tirelessly as the Editor in Chief of the RBCP, showing complete commitment every single day. He firmly flew the banner for this scientific branch, stimulating both young and experienced surgeons to divulge their productions in our midst of scientific information. We met some obstacles together, but always with a focus on the great potential of our Journal, that today has quarterly publications, a respectable reputation, open access in two languages, and great potential for further growth.

On behalf of the entire Editorial Team, we thank the immense dedication of Dr. Ricardo Baroudi to the RBCP, official publication of the Brazilian Society of Plastic Surgery.
